Multisystem Inflammatory Syndrome in Children

- CDC has issued a nationwide health advisory for medical providers to look out for pediatric multisystem inflammatory syndrome (MIS-C) that is potentially associated with COVID-19.
- Symptoms are similar to Kawasaki Disease - inflammation of arteries, specifically in the heart.
- CDC guidance for diagnosis by a medical provider includes fever of at least 100.4 degrees for at least 24 hours, inflammation in the body and hospitalization with problems in organs.
Multisystem Inflammatory Syndrome in Children

• Parents are encouraged to:
  • Contact the child’s primary care provider if there are any changes in their child’s health.
  • Watch for persistent fever in children
    • Call your pediatrician right away if your child's temperature repeatedly goes above 104 degrees.
    • If child is less than two years of age, call doctor if the fever lasts more than one day.
    • Older children, call doctor if it lasts more than 2-3 days.
  • Continue with well-child visits and keep up with vaccinations.
